Another great trouble with this country is that there are always too many politicians talking on the party line.

It seems to me that the sign of a good politician is that he can talk on the party line.

We see where some fellow says that "youth is a state of mind." Wish it were a state of mine.

Perusing a magazine article commenting on the greatly improved conditions in the mountains of Kentucky, we couldn't help but think of the old, old story, which we may have related before of the pioneer missionary in the mountains of that state, who was inquiring as to the possibilities of starting a preaching appointment in a certain locality. Seeing a woman sitting in front of a cabin, he dismounted from his horse and, doffing his hat, inquired: "Madam, are there any Methodists in this section?" The old woman grunted. "I don't know for sure," she grumbled, "but if there ever have been any, you'll find some of their hides nailed to that barn door for my old man is a crack shot."

If you owe a lot of money, you at least have the satisfaction of knowing that it isn't worth more than half what it used to be worth.
